I am writing to express my concerns regarding the practice of live export and to urge the Australian Government to take decisive action to halt this industry. The information available on the Animals Australia website highlights significant issues that warrant immediate attention and action.

The live export industry is associated with severe animal welfare concerns. Evidence suggests that animals are subjected to prolonged journeys under harsh conditions, leading to considerable suffering. The stress of transportation, inadequate access to food and water, and exposure to extreme temperatures result in high rates of illness and mortality among exported animals.

Moreover, once these animals arrive at their destination, they often face practices and conditions that are inconsistent with Australian standards of animal welfare. Reports of inhumane treatment in some importing countries underscore the need for reform in this sector.

I urge the Australian Government to consider the ethical implications and the substantial evidence provided by animal welfare organizations. It is imperative that we transition to more humane and sustainable methods of livestock management and trade. A ban on live export would reflect Australia's commitment to upholding high standards of animal welfare and would align with the values of a compassionate and progressive society.

Thank you for considering this important issue. I trust that the Government will take the necessary steps to address these concerns of the Australian people and work towards a more ethical approach to animal trade.
